Every Hero Has A Story: Laura Ingalls Wilder

Did you know there's a farm in Missouri where you can go to learn more about the author of the "Little House" book series?

Laura Ingalls Wilder penned the classic books at Rocky Ridge Farm in Mansfield, where she lived with her husband, Almanzo, and daughter, Rose.

After moving to Missouri in 1894, Laura found herself an integral part of the Mansfield community. As the website for her family home notes, "She began giving back to her community and eventually the world. Laura excelled as a parent, teacher, cook, journalist, farmer, activist and a staunch democrat. She also served as the secretary treasurer of the Mansfield Farmers Loan Association, processing more than a $1 million in government loans."

Laura got her start writing articles and columns for magazines. She wrote her autobiography about growing up in a pioneer family, but when she wasn't successful getting it published, she rewrote the story as fiction.

She published her first book, "Little House in the Big Woods" in 1932 when she was 65 years old. She published seven more books in the "Little House on the Prairie" series, as well as other books, solidifying her place in American literature.

The "Little House" book series became even more famous when it was reprinted in 1953 with artwork by Garth Williams, who had created the illustrations for "Stuart Little" and "Charlotte's Webb."

Laura's works have remained in print since first published in the 1930s. You may have even seen the TV show "Little House on the Prairie," which originally aired from 1974-83, based on Laura's books.

Laura's books shared her experiences on the American frontier to children around the world. In 1993, the U.S. Postal Service honored "Little House on the Prairie," with a stamp, commemorating it as one of the top four

Take A Road Trip to Mansfield!

Nearly all of the places Laura once lived now are National Historic Landmarks and have become tourist destinations. Rocky Ridge Farm is now known as the Laura Ingalls Wilder Historic Home and Museum. During a visit there, explore the farmhouse, which Laura and Almanzo built, as well as the Rock House, which Rose built for them in 1928. Artifacts include Pa's fiddle, family keepsakes from both the Ingalls and Wilder families, handwritten "Little House" manuscripts and other items that will delight readers of all ages. Every year, during the third weekend of September, the Mansfield community celebrates Wilder Days, commemorating Laura and pioneer life in the Missouri Ozarks. Another annual tribute to Laura's life is the Ozark Mountain Players' presentation of "Laura's Memories," an outdoor, musical theater.
